From the beach to the boat, wherever we go to enjoy the warmer weather, our phones are usually right along for the fun—and keeping them above water can be a challenging task. According to 2021 Asurion claims data, more phone repair claims are filed for water damage between June and August than any other time of the year. So, what is the best way to protect your phone from liquid damage? Asurion Experts are asked this question often while helping our 300 million (and counting) customers with all of their tech care needs. Their advice: Invest in a waterproof pouch. While some of the newest phones are considered “waterproof,” they’ll only be protected if submerged for a set period of time —to learn more, check out our guide to waterproof vs water-resistant phones. Waterproof phone pouches, like those made by CaliCase® or JOTO®, will help to keep your phone afloat. In case your device does take a plunge, here are tips for getting water out of your phone that you’ll need to know. How to get water out of your phone Here’s what to do if you drop your phone in water or get it wet: If your phone turns back on, great! Still, keep an eye on it over the next week or so, as sometimes certain features won’t work the way they used to. If you’ve tried these steps and still need a little help, we’re right around the corner. Schedule a repair at the nearest BreakFix® by Asurion or Asurion Tech Repair & Solutions™ store, and our certified experts can get your device back up and running as soon as the same day. There are a few signs that can confirm water damage to your device: Does rice fix water-damaged phones? According to Asurion Experts, putting your water-exposed device in rice may absorb some moisture. However, it may also cause other issues for your phone, such as an introduction of dust and dry starch (a rice byproduct) into your phone’s cracks and crevices. Rice could also potentially become lodged in your phone’s charging port or headphone jack, which can be extremely difficult to dislodge as the rice swells when exposed to liquid. Can you blow-dry a water-damaged phone? Blow-drying your phone when it’s exposed to water is not recommended. While it might remove some of the surface moisture, it will do very little to remove the moisture from inside your device and the heat could do irreparable damage to your phone’s internal components. How do you remove water from a charging port? Here are the steps to take to remove water from a phone’s charging port: How do you get water out of your phone speakers? Try these tips to get water out of your iPhone or Android phone speakers: Does Asurion cover water damage? While dropping your smartphone into liquid typically voids the manufacturer’s warranty automatically—many phones have indicators that change colors when wet—that isn’t the case when it comes to your smartphone insurance policy. If your phone is covered, you can start a claim at asurion.com at any time. *The Asurion® trademarks and logos are the property of Asurion, LLC. All rights reserved. We get clumsy sometimes to the extent of spilling water on our phones. Even if you were not clumsy, chances are some water got trapped into your phone’s speaker grill accidentally, and it resulted in muffled sound production. You don’t have to worry though, as we’re going to tell you the easy tips on how to remove water from phone speaker in this article. Just get prepared to try out the tips! How to remove water from phone speaker Hearing those muffled sounds could ignite the fear of having a damaged speaker in you. However, it’s not that serious if you act fast! Modern phones, even ones with no IP ratings, usually have some protection to block water damages for a certain period. So, if you act fast, you may not need to visit the service center to replace your phone speaker. To clean water from phone speaker, you either need to play a loud sound to push out the water, leave the phone under room temperature to get it dried, or visit the repair center. Try these tips and tricks to clean water from phone speaker! 1. Check your phone for the Speaker Cleaner feature! Some Android phone skins have a dedicated feature to remove foreign particles from the phone speaker when it doesn’t sound good. The feature blasts high-pitched sound at the loudest volume to remove water, dust, and other foreign particles from your phone speaker. So, before you try any other solution in this article, kindly check your phone for such a feature. It could surface as “Speaker Cleaner”, “Clear Speaker”, or whatever your OEM calls it under the sound or additional settings. For instance, the feature exists as “Clear Speaker” on some phones running MIUI software. You can visit Settings → Additional Settings → Clear Speaker and follow the on-screen instructions to clean water from the phone speaker. 2. Download an app to get water out of phone speaker and ear speaker If your phone doesn’t have the Speaker Cleaner feature, you can still play a high-pitched sound to eject the water from your phone speaker. However, playing songs from your library anyhow won’t pull any trigger. There are sounds made specifically to clean water from phone speakers, and that’s what you need. And speaking of that, you don’t need to wander around looking for those audio files, as you can use an app to get water out of phone speaker and earpiece. There are many of those apps on the Play Store that carries the “Speaker Cleaner” title, and they work like charm. Like the native “Speaker Cleaner” feature on phones, these apps play a loud, vibrating sound that gets water out of phone speaker. Here’s how to remove water from a mobile speaker with an app: Install and launch the “Speaker Cleaner - Remove Water, Dust & Boost Sound” app from the Play Store. Disconnect from your Bluetooth speaker or earbuds if you’re using any of them. Increase your phone volume to the maximum In the app, make sure the switch is set to (You can switch to Ear Speaker to get water out of ear speaker after) Now, hit the “Start Cleaning” button and position the phone in a way that the speaker is facing down. It may take up to a minute or more before it completes the process. Once completed, try playing a song to see if your phone speaker sounds well now. Otherwise, repeat the process two or three times. You can even change the sound mode 3. Let the water dry out Sincerely speaking, blasting high-pitched sound to get water out of the phone speaker would only work in some cases (maybe if the water didn’t go deep inside the speaker). In most cases, what works is leaving the phone somewhere to dry completely. You can leave the phone under room temperature for several hours (usually 24hrs at max) to dry out. Just ensure you place the phone in such a way that the affected speaker is facing down. Alternatively, you can bury your phone in uncooked rice for at least 24 hours. Doing so is effective to drain water from the phone speaker because the nature of rice is to suck in every liquid/moist around it. Still no luck? Fix your water-damaged phone. Unfortunately, if none of our tips on how to remove water from mobile speakers could bring back your muffled speaker to life, you might just have hit the solution you can try at home. As said earlier in this article, you may be able to salvage your water-damaged phone speaker if you act fast. If, however, it was late before you found these DIY tricks on how to remove water from phone speaker, your last option is to visit the repair center. More so, it’s advisable to let a technician check your phone if it took long inside the water. Who knows? The water might have damaged other sensitive parts of the phone. We have a handy list of the best phone insurance options out there. Just make sure to read the fine print to ensure the insurance policy covers accidental and water damage. Turn it off ASAP! Edgar Cervantes / Android AuthorityI know it’s hard to react quickly after such a devastating event, but you must snap out of it! The longer your device stays underwater, the lower its chances of survival are. You must dig in there and take that phone out of the water right away. Yes... even if it’s in the toilet! Once the phone is out of the water, make sure it’s off and stays that way. Even if it seems okay... it is important to shut it off just in case. If the phone is still on, just shut it down. Those who still have a removable battery should take it off. Turning off the device ensures that water doesn’t reach and damage important phone parts while electronics are active. Water reaching operating components is more likely to cause permanent damage. More: The best phones with a removable battery What not to do after you dropped a phone in waterJimmy Westenberg / Android AuthorityThe following actions can mean the difference between a totaled phone or a survival story. You better be careful what you do. Before we jump into finding a solution, let’s try to prevent major failures you could cause. Do not turn on the phone, as we already mentioned. Electrical components don’t play well with water when operating. Don’t plug it in either! For the same reason. Don’t press any keys. This can push water further into the phone. It’s best to mess with the phone as little as possible. Don’t shake or blow into the device. This may also push water into deeper areas of the phone. Especially try to avoid blow driers — not only because of the blowing part, but also because of the following point. Do not apply any heat to the phone. Remember, excessive heat can also damage the phone. Don’t move the phone around too much. Same deal: you don’t want the water moving around inside the phone. More: Common Android problems and how to fix them Disassemble the water damaged phoneEric Zeman / Android AuthorityDon’t mistake this step with “take the whole darn phone apart!”. What we mean is that you should remove everything that is user-removable. If your back cover is removable, take it off. Similarly, try to remove the battery (if you can), SIM card, and SD card. Lay it all out on a paper towel. Most phones have no removable backs nowadays, but do what you can. Now, if you are an experienced tech specialist of sorts, know the ins and outs of a phone, and don’t mind voiding your warranty, you can go ahead and take the whole phone apart too. It might help with drying up every single piece faster. Just be careful, if you don’t know what you’re doing, this could cause more harm than good. Related: To solve the smartphone e-waste problem, we first need fewer disposable devices Try to dry the exterior Edgar Cervantes / Android Authority We first have to try to get rid of all the excess water found in the exterior of your phone. Use a cloth or paper towel to dry out everything as much as you can. Just make sure you don’t mess with the phone too much. Gently dry everything out without moving things around too much. All this water can make its way inside the phone, which isn’t good news. You could try a vacuum cleanerOf course, there are areas the paper towel can’t access. And while we told you not to blow anything into the phone, we didn’t tell you not to suction the water out. In fact, a vacuum cleaner can suck off bits of water from the phone without too much risk. Just make sure the suctioning doesn’t make the phone move around excessively. Also read: How to clean and disinfect your phone to help prevent the spread of germs Time to dry out the water damaged phoneRobert Triggs / Android AuthorityThe hardest part is now, because it involves leaving the phone alone for some time. We know simply waiting isn’t easy, but it’s necessary. If you have another phone or one you can borrow, make sure the SIM card is completely dried out and stick it into the working handset. Otherwise, resort to smoke signals, public phones, and all that archaic stuff. So how do you dry your phone out? You could leave the phone on the counter or inside a drawer, but some people like giving it a little help. The idea is to put it in an environment that will ease its drying process. Next to a window works great, as the moving air (if the window is open) and sunlight might help a bit. It could also help to put them next to a fan or air conditioning vent. Robert Triggs / Android AuthorityAnother very common practice is to put the phone in a Ziploc bag full of rice and let it rest for about two or three days. Why rice? Mainly because it is something readily available at most homes. Rice is dry, and hence very good at absorbing humidity in the air, making the phone’s environment drier and helping dry out the device. With that said, if you can make your way to a store, there are better alternatives. Among better options are silica gel packs, which are those little packets you often find in shoes or electronics boxes (and you can’t eat). It’s not like all of us have these laying around, but if you think ahead of time you, could get good deals on Amazon. And while we are on the whole thinking ahead topic— you could also buy a water rescue kit. I happen to like Kensington’s EVAP bundle, which includes a special bag and silica gel packs. Kensington states this is 700% more effective at drying moisture than rice is, though it’s hard to say how true their claim is. Still, it might be worth the investment. The moment of truthDavid Imel / Android AuthoritySo you did everything you could and a few days have passed by. It’s time to see if all your efforts paid off. Take the phone out of wherever you left it and put it all together. Then plug the phone in and try to turn it on. If it works, you have succeeded! Stay on the lookout for any odd behavior, though, at least for a few days. Also, test all the components. Make a call to see if the microphone and earphone work, test the speaker, etc. Now, if the phone doesn’t work, it’s time to accept defeat and take it to a professional and see if it can be salvaged. You can also claim insurance if you have it. Not to sound like a doctor, but after this point we have really done everything we could. Sometimes you have to let the phone go. Did your phone die?
